Courtesy of Teens Read Too Von Teens Read Too Fourteen-year old Sam Parma has only played one game of 9-hole golf in his life...he's a baseball guy...but Sam's mom wants Sam and his little brother, Matthew, to enter the renowned Schoolboy

Junior Golf Tournament that Uncle Charlie won when he was a teenager. It's an annual event and both boys can enter the competition since there are separate categories for each age group. The tournament is today, and she plans to drop the boys off at the golf course. The set of clubs that Grandpa had given Sam are stamped "ladies" on the bottom, and most are repaired with electrical tape. He would like to have a better set of clubs, but, oh well...it will probably be fun. Sam is teamed up with three older boys in the fourteen to seventeen age bracket. There is Chad Ashworth, Jr., who is dressed to the nines, and has a professional set of new looking clubs. Definitely a Country Club kind of guy and probably nearly a pro. Buzzy uses verbal profanity and throws loud tantrums when things don't go quite the way he wants. The third boy is a seventeen-year-old, cigarette-smoking, long-haired kid named Mark Crowe. His indifferent attitude makes him seem like bad news from the start. Sam definitely has his ups-and-downs during the game, but he meets the challenges with integrity and honesty, and makes an exciting par on the 7th hole. There are many unexpected obstacles, and a frightening confrontation between Sam and Mark Crowe as Sam stands up for what he knows is right. Matthew, as well, has a surprising game result. Tony Rosa has penned this exciting, fast-paced story based on some of his own experiences. Rosa incorporates some wonderful moral lessons in this easy-to-read story that would encourage even reluctant readers to join Sam Parma in a game of golf. The realistic characters are just like some people that you probably know. I hope to see more of Sam's adventures from this talented first-time author. Reviewed by: Grandma Bev

Kurzbeschreibung Fourteen-year-old Sam Parma plays more baseball than golf, so when his mother urges him to play in a junior golf tournament, he protests but reluctantly agrees. Learning that his uncle was a two time winner of the Schoolboy Championship, Sam feels pressure to perform as well as excitement for potential success. Dropped off at the municipal golf course with a hodgepodge set of clubs, limited skills, and the added responsibility to look after his younger brother, Sam ventures to the sign-up table. There he meets his three playing partners: a well-equipped rich kid, a profanity-spraying cheater, and an oversized neighborhood bully. Getting to the first tee is the easy part for Sam. Making it past unexpected obstacles, squaring off in conflict, and conquering his fears are only some of the challenges he faces on the course. Sam makes lasting memories and learns a number of lessons about honesty, sportsmanship, and courtesy-lessons that will guide him throughout his life.Growing up, Tony Rosa was encouraged to play in several junior golf tournaments with his younger brother. These events contributed far more insight into life's lessons than he ever expected and served as inspiration for The Schoolboy. Rosa lives in Florida.
